In Familiar Music, a Pianist Shows What He Can Do

"If you don't know me by now," runs the opening line of a famous song by Harold Melvin and the Blue Notes, "you will never, never, never know me." This could be about the core classical-music repertory, certainly from the point of view of anyone who has gone through a competition, in which pieces are reduced to one-word tags (as in "the judges would like to hear the Beethoven").

MUSIC REVIEW

ANNE MIDGETTE

So Ilya Yakushev, who won the 2005 World Piano Competition in Cincinnati, didn't need to go into any detail about his recital at Alice Tully Hall on Saturday night. The pieces were simply listed in the program — a Haydn sonata in D, Prokofiev's Sonata No. 7, Mussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" — without any elaboration on things like movements. After all, if you don't know these works by now, what are more words really going to tell you? So what if you're hazy on the order of the pictures in Mussorgsky's show. The real point, from the standpoint of a competition, is to hear what the pianist can do in them.

Mr. Yakushev can do just about anything he wants. In the Haydn that meant finding in a Steinway the tinkling, busy-sounding alter ego of its predecessor, the fortepiano, a quality that resounded through the fast passagework of the first and third movements, though it yielded to a dark, mellow romanticism in the second. In the notoriously difficult Prokofiev, the instrument took on a whole different character, ringing and martial yet tinged with this composer's brand of lighthearted irony. Mr. Yakushev showed superb control, bringing the music to the brink of hysteria and the piano's capacity for noise making, without ever letting it get away from him. And he was able to make a repeated single note resound more pointedly than the fabric of quieter chords surrounding it.

Ilya Yakushev Alice Tully Hall

He also showed a consistent gentleness, a fluid touch even in forceful passages that let the music flow with legato and smoothed its edges, though it didn't mask them.

For all of his fortissimo playing, particularly in Mussorgsky's "Pictures" (its harmonies touched with a slight sourness, like pumpernickel), it was sometimes hard to get a true sense of climax. Or perhaps it was simply hard to get away from the sense that this competition winner was phenomenally schooled, controlled and polished; hard, in short, truly to get to know him.

World Piano Competition

A C I N C I N N A T I L E G A C Y

Our History

For over five decades, The World Piano Competition has been promoting the finest young artistic talent in the keyboard world. Cincinnati's own piano competition is noted for its dedication to both young artists (ages 5-17) and emerging professionals (ages 18-31).

Nurtured by founder and Executive Director Gloria Ackerman, The World Piano Competition has developed young talent for 54 years – a unique and important part of the competition's outreach. When she first came to Cincinnati in 1956 as a recent graduate of Toronto's Royal Conservatory of Music, she set out to improve the level of her own piano students. She succeeded, and one thing led to another.

Gloria Ackerman moved to Cincinnati to study at the Conservatory of Music and to set up a private piano studio. She had been educated in Toronto, where she says they audition 60,000 kids a year – all instruments and voices – for the purpose of monitoring their training. She felt that monitoring was in order in Cincinnati, too, so after a year of teaching she invited some friends down from Canada to comment on her students' progress.

She worked hard to spread the idea of monitoring the development of the local piano students. "I knew that most of the teachers here bought their supplies at the Willis Music Company," she said, "so I went through all of Willis' piano music, graded it and made a 12-page list. I asked them if they'd duplicate it and distribute it. They did, and within eight years we had 30 or 40 teachers and more than 200 students in the organization."

THE BIG STEP was taken twenty six years ago. "In 1972 we managed to get Andre Watts as a judge," Ms. Ackerman explained. That was really the start of what we are today. After the examinations were finished Watts just sat in a swivel chair in my apartment, smoking cigars and thinking. Finally he said "I've been looking for two years for a piano competition to become involved with. This is the one! I want to help you."

And help he did. Watts became president of AMSA. He was an active leader, not just the holder of an honorary title. At his first board meeting, Ms. Ackerman says, he thumped his hand on the table and declared: This is to become the most important musical organization in the country, and here's $5,000 to help get it started." Watts also suggested that instead of simply giving cash prizes and a pat on the back to the college level winners, participation in a series of master classes with leading pianists also be included in the award.

The idea of master classes – which to date have been given, free of charge, by such notables as Artur Schnabel, Malcolm Frager, Leon Fleisher and the late Gina Bachauer – is really what sets The World Piano Competition apart from the dozens of other piano contests held in America today.

A media milestone highlighted the 2003 competition with CNN's international broadcast to 64 million viewers, with 4 million more through Time Warner Cable, and National Public Radio, as well as features on The Today Show and ABC Evening News. This year, for two month's preceding the competition, a recent BBB Club (Bach, Beethoven, Brahms) program was aired on Time Warner Cable's On Demand reaching over 640,000 viewers in Southwest, Ohio.

Throughout its 54 years, Musicianship, Discipline and Musical-Cultural Sensitivity have remained the keys to the WPC's programs and its success.

“The World Piano Competition has become one of America’s most important musical organizations, as it fills a necessary part of the whole musical building in the country today.”

“The program offered by this association is distinctively different from all other national and international piano competitions, because it offers helpful guidance for the very young category of performers and because it is concerned with encouraging yearly goals and continuing high standards in piano study – something that is more than a one-shot award for the contest winner only, but instead an enriching experience for all who participate.”
